Re: E-paper Volume 2

I was invited by my friend to Indian wedding. Actually the couple was a mix: Indian fellow and Singaporean lady. Wedding ceremonies and procedures are similar to the one in Taiwan: official engagement, temple, reception, party and house visiting. The only difference is that the guy receives from the bride's family all the gifts (gold, money, car, house etc.) which is other way round than in traditional Taiwan.

The classes I took came out to be pretty interesting and most of them I knew I will enjoy. Class with prof. DVR Sheshadri was a hammer - Reinventing yourself through Entrepreneurial Leadership. Behind the title amazing content and message was hidden. We were talking a lot about purpose of life, social responsibility, helping communities, but by what we are actually doing in the corporate or our own companies. We have also analyzed many cases of great people serving other people, simply by reinventing their existing jobs. Second class I took was Spirituality and Self-development for Global Managers, the class about all religions of the world and connection with spirituality. I was also able during this course meet some local saints, Gurus. Amazing experience and truly refreshing, when someone reads your mind and answer your questions you didn't even ask to him.

Before end of the year I went for a small trip to Hampi. Place which is best for tourists as it really shows how old and developed was the culture of Indians. Most of the ruins are under Unesco protection, but to be honest nobody cares and its really dirty, trashes all over the places. After seeing all sights and buying "special" tickets for foreigners to entry the sights (total rip off), together with my friend we chilled out at the local river watching people taking evening bath and washing their clothes. Next day we rented a bike and went for a trip on the other side and climbed amazing temple where monks were chanting some sacred syllables. There is many amazing places in India where you feel the special spirit and can get some piece of mind created by the ambience.
