

17th March 2011

It was a day of visiting. After waiting for so long, I could finally meet my friends acquainted in the States long long time ago. They are basically a couple, but a couple of two nationalities. One of them is from France, the other is from Columbia. Since they deeply fell in love with each other, the girl decided to move to where the boy lives, Lyon. Lyon is the second biggest city in France. From the diversity of transportation I could clearly understand why. They got bus, they got metro, they also got tram!

During these 5 days of stay at my friend's place, I barely woke up early enough to do enough sightseeing. Also this trip was a lot different from what I had before since the main purpose was visiting. Therefore, I either waited for my friends to ask me out or I walked around where they lived leisurely. The first day I was welcomed by a great French dinner which had salad as the entrée, steamed marinated fish and vegetables as the main course, and the most French part, all kinds of cheese as dessert. After that I had couple glasses of liquors and a nice chat then went to bed. Oh I also made a new friend there because they had a Columbian friend coming over too!

The next day the Columbian girl took me to a hill in Lyon where there lies a great and majestic cathedral and you can overlook the entire Lyon city and enjoy the panorama. There I bumped into some other friends from school but we didn't go together. It was a day full of coincidence because we ran into each other soon after we split up.

Also there was a day when we didn't have a lot of activities until the night came because my friends told me they will go to their friends' house parties. They also said it was for me although I seriously doubt that since we all know they tend to love parties more than we do! We went to a flat where there was everything a party needs. A dancing room equipped with fancy stereos and a colorful light bulbs which could only be seen in clubs, a locker room, a specious living room for chatting and drinking. I was amazed how they could make a party such a gorgeous and complete joy. I am pretty sure it was no worse than those we see in other clubs!
